World traveler Sergey Melnikoff opens new gallery in Boca Raton

While most people were relaxing or celebrating our nation’s independence on July 4, Dr. Sergey Melnikoff was hard at work putting finishing touches on the Melnikoff Gallery at 251 N. Federal Highway, Boca Raton.

“Tomorrow I leave for Zimbabwe,” Melnikoff explained Monday in the gallery. “I am renting a helicopter to photograph Victoria Falls. I have never been there before.”

There are few places on earth Melnikoff has not visited. Since fleeing from Russia via Mongolia in 1986 and settling in America in 1990, Melnikoff has crisscrossed the globe countless times (he has collected 180 pages of visas on his passport over the past ten years), capturing nature’s wonder on his Leica and Fuji wide-format cameras.

Melnikoff’s photos are owned by President George W. Bush, Sir Elton John, the King of Nepal, the Sultan of Brunei, billionaire Jeffrey Koo and many others.

Melnikoff has three university degrees and has written a number of books, but since coming to America he has settled on large-format art photography for his milieu. While working as a journalist in Russia, Melnikoff ran afoul of the hard-line Communist government, and he was imprisoned in 1980, to spend six years in what he describes as a concentration camp. “When Mikhail Gorbachev became general secretary of the USSR, he was more tolerant of critics of Communism,” he recounts. “If not for him I would have been in prison for another ten years. He pardoned me in 1986, but a friend of mine who knew the Soviet general prosecutor told me I had just one day to escape before they arrested me again. I took my wife and young daughter and escaped through Mongolia. We spend three days in a UN refugee camp, and they relocated us to Thailand. In 1990 we came to Unlontown, Pennsylvania, near Pittsburgh. I was an FBI protected refugee.”

Melnikoff will turn 50 next week in Zimbabwe. He then will travel to one of his favorite places, Kyrgyz in Middle Asia (“It’s very beautiful,” he says), and thence to South China before returning to South Florida a month away.

“We have looked at Lincoln Road (Miami Beach), Las Olas (Fort Lauderdale) and Fourth Street in West Palm Beach,” Melnikoff reveals. “But we settled on Boca Raton for our first gallery. It’s a very artistic community, and we like the proximity to Mizner Park. If this gallery goes well, we plan to open more.”
